005 855a ALARUMS AND EXCURSIONS BY ARTHUR SCOTT CRAVEN

THE LIBRARY
OF
THE UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA
LOS ANGELES

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2007 with funding from Microsoft Corporation

ALARUMS AND EXCURSIONS

"ALARUMS AND EXCURSIONS"

BY

ARTHUR SCOTT CRAVEN

In memory of the third of August M CM X

JOE SKINNER

ALARUMS AND EXCURSIONS

 $\begin{array}{c} & & \text{BY} \\ \text{ARTHUR SCOTT CRAVEN} \end{array}$

LONDON
ELKIN MATHEWS, VIGO STREET, W.
MCMX

AUTHOR'S NOTE

As the original editions of "Poems in Divers Keys" and "Joe Skinner" are now exhausted, I have made a selection here of some of those poems which appeared in the first volume. "Joe Skinner" reappears in extenso.

On a previous occasion I expressed my acknow-ledgments to the proprietors and editors of those papers by whose courtesy I was permitted to republish several of the shorter pieces. The present volume contains considerable matter now published for the first time, including "Fudge" and "Mukerji Lal," both in a light vein.

ARTHUR SCOTT CRAVEN.

August, 1910.

CONTENTS

PAGE
ΙI
13
16
18
20
24
25
29
31
32
33
35
38
39
40
41
43
45
48
55
78

Roses and Rue*

WHITHER, fair lady!
Tarry, fair lady!
Life is a garden of roses and rue.
Wherefore, fair lady,
Tarry, fair lady!
I have a word of fair caution for you,
A word of fair caution for you!

Whither so brightly?
Whither so lightly?
Fates for a penny, each warranted true.
Tarry, fair lady!
Marry, fair lady,
Life were a garden unworthy of you,
A garden unworthy of you!

Whither fair lady?
(Hither, fair lady!)
Fain would I whisper one word in your ear:
An he deceive you,
Love you and leave you,
Never was lover yet worthy a tear,
Or worthy a sigh or a tear!

^{*} The fool's song in "The Last of the English."

Thither, fair lady!
Hie thee back, lady.
Life is a garden of roses and rue.
E'en an thou findest
The best and the kindest,
Never could husband be worthy of you—
Be worthy, fair lady, of you!

Ave Maria

(At the gates of a convent an Irish peasant girl is kneeling before an image of the Virgin Mother and Child)

Ave Maria, O Mother o' glory, Smile on the infant I lay at your feet. Och, but I'll tell ye the truth of the story— (See how he looks at ye-croonin' so sweet!) Eves big wid wonder, So grave and so pretty, All contint under Thy smile an' thy pity-Ave Maria! Ave Maria! Queen of the Hivins in glory above. Both intercedin' Thy care an' affection; Arrah, he's pleadin' Yer love an' protection. Ave Maria. Ave Maria. Mother o' Jesus, O Mother o' love.

Mother, I've fallen—but oh! it's bereft me Of hope an' of gladness, of pride an' of name; Blindly I trusted him—gaily he left me, Mad an' forlorn wid my grief an' my shame. Faith, an' it may be Ye scorn me for strayin'—But oh! it's my baby Before ye I'm layin'.

Ave Maria. Ave Maria.
Smilin', at pace, wid your own on your knee.
Sure, an' it's only
A sinner that's kneelin',
But mine lies so lonely,
An' sad an' appealin'.
Ave Maria. Ave Maria.
Hope of the desolate, Star of the sea.

Mother, O Mother, wid pity receive him! Shield him from slanders, an' evils, an' harms; Outcast an' homeless, I love him an' leave him Warm and at rest in your shelterin' arms. Happily sleepin', I tremble to wake him. Safe in your keepin'-Oh, tenderly take him! Ave Maria. Ave Maria. Only the gloom an' the shadow for mc. Mother, I'm goin', Heart-stricken an' weepin'; Mine was the sowin', Let mine be the reapin'! Ave Maria. Ave Maria. Mother o' mercy, O Star o' the sea.

Mother o' sinners, I'm sure not defilin'
The altar in castin' my all at your shrine?
Maybe he sees you in dreams—for he's smilin'—
Spurned an' derided—but, Mother, he's mine!
Ah, but you'll bear him
No shade o' resentment.

Sweet Mother, spare him
His smilin' contentment!
Ave Maria. Ave Maria.
Queen o' the Angels o' glory above.
Troth, with the morrow
An' no man shall scorn him;
But ah! wid what sorrow
An' wailin' I'll mourn him!
Ave Maria. Ave Maria.
Mother o' pity, O Mother o' love!

Sweet as the mornin' the sisters shall find him, Keenin' ochone for the love that was there: Troth, but they'll fancy 'twas you who consigned him, Mother o' God, to their keepin' an' care. Sure, you'll endear him To all who attend him? Mother, be near him To guard an' befriend him. Ave Maria. Ave Maria. Mother o' Jesus, ah, list to my call! Faith, I'll not falter, Although the heart's breakin': Safe at your altar-(Oh, wisht !-but he's wakin'!) Ave Maria. Ave Maria. Hope of the fatherless, Mother of all.

The Reaping

Sweet, and fair, and all-forgiving!

Leave no platitude unsaid:

Desecrate the sentient living,

Venerate th' insensate dead.

Kiss her hand and smooth her brow!

Could the wrong be righted now!

Could the choice be ours again,

Would the wronged have asked in vain?

As we went our divers ways
In the morning of our days,
Could we have the night foreseen—
Ah! and ah! the might have been!

Never yet was evil righted
Till the last dread debt was paid;
Never good yet unrequited,
Though a thousand years delayed.
Place the lilies on her breast,
One more erring heart at rest!
Fair white lilies, none too fair
For the sleeper resting there.

Could sad years of tears and shame One mad hour of sin reclaim, Or the end have been foreseen— Ah! and ah! the might have been! On Life's ship, whose chart lies hidden,
Comes a watch, or soon or late,
When the voyager unbidden,
Holds the pilot-wheel of Fate.
Fool and coward, after-wise!
Fume, excuse and moralise!
Ours the choice of wind and course,
Sun and song, or bleak remorse.

Could we then have dared the right In the blackness of our night, Or the after-shoal foreseen— Ah! and ah! the might have been!

Sweet, and fair, and all-forgiving!

Leave no platitude unsaid:

Desecrate the sentient living,

Venerate th' insensate dead.

Kiss her hand and smooth her brow!

Could the wrong be righted now!

Could the choice be ours again,

Would the wronged have asked in vain?

By the vows we lovers swear, By the ills ye women bear, Could this hour have been foreseen! Ah! and ah! the might have been!

The Death of Háfiz

FAREWELL, farewell, ye long-loved walls and towers! Within your gates all sweet it was to dwell, And hold long converse with the trees and flowers When o'er my garden starry evening fell, And thoughts—too wonderful for song to tell—Did stir the sleeping fire within my breast: Shiraz! old city of my heart, farewell! His sun is set! Thy Háfiz goes to rest—His truest note unsung, his sweetest unexpressed.

Ah see, my brothers! Darkness lights our sky:
A myriad suns in calm effulgence shine:
Still do I ask—half-fearing: "Whence came I?"
Or "Whither goes this soul I dare call mine?"
Oh, he who here hath drunk of earth's best wine
Doth know beyond a something grander lies;
Or who hath tasted once a love divine,
That love profanes to deem its sweetness dies.
Still—from our earthy depths—let's contemplate the skies.

'Tis in our work our naked soul appear, Howso we seek their bareness to disguise; And that I am is truly written here— For him to read who reads with seeing eyes: From falsehood's dregs know yet the truth will rise,
And vain the hope its presence to conceal—
The wine the singer fain would eulogise
Doth but the dull despair therein reveal.
Through every mask and guise e'er peeps the artless real.

Herein our hope: no goal by man attained
But lost in sweetness ever as 'twas neared,
No noble end, or seeming summit gained,
But on the instant fairer heights appeared:
And—looking backward—now the mist hath cleared,
We see God's goodness at the journey's end;
And that we grieved o'er, that which most we feared,
Were but the rungs by which we did ascend.
Then Death, whate'er thy guise, I'll greet thee as a friend.

The Cross in the Rock

(Land's End, Cornwall)

TILL England's bulwarks sink away, And fall before the tireless tide, This cross I carve shall here abide To mark the troth I plight to-day: O Love and Right shall rule for aye! And this shall be the world's refrain, And never reck what cynics say.

Now let the little cynics chide,
Their sorry jeers I here disdain!
Too long, methinks, I've been their prey,
And follow'd sadly in their train,
With Right my shield their hope is vain—
Though all the Powers of darkness tried,
They should not wrest this joy away!

With one resolve I burst the chain
That keeps me from the living day;
A grand elixir fires my brain,
And lifts me from a world of clay
To some ethereal distant plane,
Where only Love and Right may reign,
And hold, uncheck'd, their bounteous sway.

For Love and Right shall rule for aye, And nothing can their power restrain; Though wrong eclipse them for a day, Supreme, enduring they remain. Then shall we reck what cynics say? Behold the sign, sweet promised bride— Till England's bulwarks sink away!

"Where lurks the rose that blooms for aye?" Its passing madness," let them say:
"A thing that lives a summer day,
And dies unmourned ere eventide:"
Well, Time will prove their erring wide!
An they can such fair love deride,
What heed shall we to cynics pay?

A shelter from the cold and rain, A rock of refuge—there to hide, And find surcease from care and pain! With love to spur, with hope to guide, And you, dear sweetheart, by my side, What fairer joy shall life contain, Or earth afford, or Heaven provide?

The black clouds flash their fires in vain: Nor wind, nor storm, nor flood allied Shall rend these sturdy rocks in twain.

To hallow thee, sweet promised bride—(And shall I reck what cynics say?)
Till England's bulwarks sink away,

And fall before the tireless tide,
This chiselled cross shall here abide
To mark the troth I plight to-day.
Behold the sign! Let laugh who may

Behold the sign! Let laugh who may—(And little cynics!—still deride!)
For fifty thousand moons shall wane,
And Titan Powers and Empires wide
To nothingness shall fall again,
Yet still this rough-hewn cross remain
To mark the troth I plight to-day.

And nations, soaring in their pride,
Shall see their vaunted might decay,
Yet still this humble cross retain
The meaning that it bears to-day:
To follow Right, and naught beside—
Ay, though a world the wrong should gain,
And never heed what cynics say.

Tho' Justice for a while delay When the oppressed to her hath cried, No righteous tear is shed in vain, And Time no wrong hath justified. For every jot unjustly ta'en A tyrant nation yet shall pay, And deep the cup of penance drain.

And peoples groaning 'neath her sway, Shall in their turn as Masters reign— So runs the long confusing play, But Time will make the meaning plain: Though men and nations loom and wane, Unswerving still the Right shall stay Through every act, and scene, and day.

When nodding Time hath laid aside His glass and scythe, the poets say, And our old world hath run its day, And every leaf is seared and dried— Upon the ashes of the slain, Tho' ne'er another life remain, One single rose shall bloom for aye.

Though every other flower hath died, And fallen to ordained decay,
This boon she hath, to them denied—
Her sweetness shall not pass away.
Nor shall her power or beauty wane,
Though earth awake to life again
To voice the triumph of her sway.

And Love's the rose that blooms for aye, And Love shall unresisted reign—So runs the moral of the play, And Time will make the meaning plain. "A thing that lives a summer day!" Ah, shall we reck what cynics say? Behold the sign, sweet promised bride—Till England's bulwarks sink away!

The Cross in the Rock Re-visited

Hasr thou forgotten, old heart—that thy beating Is steady and slow as a grandfather clock? Wake from thy slumbers, and give it a greeting! Twenty long years since our last merry meeting! And here—as we left it—the cross in the rock! Shame on thee, shame on thee, fickle old master! Beat as thou didst in the days of thy prime. Treble thy tempo, sir! Faster, aye faster, And give me a taste of the once on a time.

Time changeth all things—and, Time, thou art flying! Yet change not, old heart, an the years weigh on me: Come, for old love's sake make show of replying! Only the waves now to echo my sighing, And only a sob from the heart of the sea. Shame on thee, shame on thee, faithless old traitor! Wouldst thou not lessen this weight on my brow? Let retrospection and sorrow come later, But spare me a sip of the old nectar now.

Still dull and deaf to my earnest entreating? Then, heart, I acquit thee of will to offend: On with thy solemn mechanical beating! Journeys may yet end in true lovers meeting (And only God knows how each journey will end). Still stand'st thou, old rock—Time's ravage defying, And staunch to the cross I entrusted to thee!
... But only the waves to echo my sighing, And only a moan from thy bosom, O sea!

Sallie Dear

(In Dartmoor Prison)

SAY, Sal, old pal, I 'erd a lark strike up 'er merry note, T'other day,

Down this way.

We was diggin' arter hours 'cos we'd broke the prison rules,

An' we slacked a bit to 'arken like a pack o' love-sick fools;

An' I felt—upon my soul I did—a sinkin' in the throat, For it brought to mind a memory o' you.

Lord, it's true,

Thoughts o' you

As you was when fust I loved yer, Sallie dear.

We're 'ardened brutes the lot of us, the chaplain tells us so—

Satan's own,

Christ's out-thrown!

But there wasn't one as didn't wince in all the ploughin' gang,

Or feel 'is 'art grow softer as that little beggar sang,

An' I blubbered like a babby. Why? It's kinder 'ard to know,

But I sorter felt 'ow wrong I'd treated you.

Straight I did,
An' no kid-*

'Ow I'd changed yer smiles to mournin', Sallie dear.

I see you now in court, old gal, the kiddie on your arm,

Jes' the same, Brave an' game.

An' the judge's raspin' sentence rushes streamin' through my ears,

An' I see you—as I seed you then—'alt smilin' through your tears;

An' I 'ear your whisper: Don't 'ee fret—the boy won't come to harm,

For the Friend o' little children understands.

Lord, I ain't No white saint,

But yer kinder brought 'im 'ome then, Sallie dear.

I've worked an' lied in solitood—'alf dreamin' in my cell,

Livin' through Days with you.

O God, to walk abroad unwatched! to mock the mockin' chain!

To drink the air o' liberty! to know myself again!
To feel I own a will once more! I'm ramblin', eh?
ah, well—

Only slaves can teach the free what freedom means.

For no light Follows night,

But each mornin' brings death closer, Sallie dear.

* And no mistake.

An' so I've lingered 'ere for years—jes' look around the room!

Think, old wife, Doomed for life

Where 'uman love ain't ever seen, where speakin' ranks as crime,

Where one day apes another so we lose account of time,

Where buried 'ope an' manhood rot inside a prison tomb,

An' the dreams men dream of freedom reap despair.

Night an' day Pass away,

But they leave no smiles behind 'em, Sallie dear.

Well then I must ha' sickened, for they sent me out to plough

'Ere last May,
'Eaven's own day!

Oh, Sal, the dew of mornin' then—the light—the space—the green—

The air, the sense o' breathin' free, the wonder of that scene!

The world was made for me that day—it comes afore me now!

An' I 'ear

Low an' clear

That old song as brought me gladness, Sallie dear.

An' now I'm back in 'ospital. Ah, Sal, still keep my 'and!

I don't fear When you're near. It's only when I'm left alone I feel afraid to die,

The white-washed walls, the 'ush, the night, the soul's despairin' cry,

The tread o' feet, the gloom without, the unknown, 'idden land,

An' the mighty Judge of all we learn to dread.

So I lie

Glad to die,

For I 'old I've bought my freedom, Sallie dear.

Oh, Sal, the hours I've toiled in vain, the broken years I've seen;

Sigh an' tear

Anchor 'ere,

But to my dull an' achin' eye there comes a light at last

Grim skeletons an' shadows of a dimmed an' banished past!

Ah, Sal, old pal, what might ha' been! That cry:
What might ha' been!

But 'E 'ears it-for 'E calls me-an' I go!

Ay, sweet light

Crowns my night,

An' the dawn of ages guides me, Sallie dear.

The Song of the Stars

(Addressed to a disappointed little person in tears who pined for "solace")

> "O nuit! déroulez en silence Les pages du livre des cieux."

> > -Lamartine.

Look up! Look up! Behold the stars, A myriad suns beyond the sun, Serene, resplendent, clear!

I.

Too long distress hath been my lot
To fear the things you fear;
When our brief sun of life hath run
Will shadows disappear.
Then courage, courage, gentle one!
When all is done, when all is done,
There's something yet beyond the sun—
(A myriad worlds beyond the sun!)
Serene, majestic, clear!

II.

Then come what may we'll care no jot!
We—who have sorrowed here,
What little solace we have got
Will hold that little dear.

Or if of solace we have none,
When all is done, when all is done,
There's something yet beyond the sun—
(A myriad worlds beyond the sun!)
Serene, majestic, clear!

III.

Still hope and labour—waver not
Though never night so drear!
Adversity hath stol'n from me
The solace of a tear:
Come, blind Fortuna, what's the plot?
Bring weal or woe, when all is done
There's something yet beyond the sun—
(A myriad worlds beyond the sun)
Serene, majestic, clear!

IV.

Then like grim warriors of old,
Let's glory in our scars,
And read aright, my doubting wight,
God's emblem of the stars:
Our highest, best, achieved—behold
A higher niche and sphere!
Nor deem the battle lost or won,
There's something yet beyond the sun
When our brief thread of life is spun
And sorrows disappear:
A myriad suns beyond the sun—
Serene, resplendent, clear!

A Fragment

In Life's meridian could we hold
The sun, like Joshua of old—
To keep in check advancing night,
And change our fortune in the fight.
Or could we bid the moon abide
To suit our circumstance and tide—
Had we the power,
Or I, or you
(Who dream away this pregnant hour),
What things we'd do!

Life's Prologue

PLAY well this scene!
Though but a poor prelude to some all-sweet hereafter,
'Tis one scene certain;
Death comes between
As veiling curtain,
And what will follow—will!
Let it suffice we're here—

Not knowing why, or whence we came, or whither drifting,

But—being here—let's hold the stage like men, Scorning base doubt and fear.

Whate'er the part,
How sad and all obscure—or cramped by sorry setting,
We are wisely cast;
And from these hard conditions best may rise
To dream-seen heights afar:
Then with a heart
Fearless to the last,
Strong, and enduring still,
Let's bear with things that are;
And—as ourselves—disdaining weak disguise,
Let's enter boldly on this enterprise,
With faith in our good star!

"The Call to Arms"

Hodge Loquitur

'TAINT no sort o' use denyin'
There's a summat about dyin'
To the sound o' bugle calls,
An' the thud o' cannon balls,
An' the whiz o' bullets flyin',
An' the rumble o' guns firin'
Wot's consid'rable inspirin'
To the man as stays behind.

Yus, it's fine an' fair excitin',
An' a thing I takes delight in:
Just the thought o' beggars fightin'
Makes me tingle through and through!
It's the martial instinct brewin',
An' it kinder needs subjuin',
So my wery best I'm doin'
All sich feelin's to subjoo.

I'm a chap o' brawn an' muscle, An' it's 'ard to 'ave to tussle 'Gin these bulldog inclinations When sich fever fires the blood, But the thought o' my relations—

34 ALARUMS AND EXCURSIONS

(In pertikler dear old mother)— Makes me wishful fer to smother All sich feelin's in the bud.

Still, there ain't no use denyin' There's a summat about dyin' To the rumble o' guns firin' Wot's pertikler inspirin'.

Billie Boy

(An Aggressive Eulogy)

'E's a Prod-i-gee, Our Billie, So 'e is!

O there ain't a kid in all the world kin brush the boots o' mine!

My own Billie, little Billie, Billie Boy!

'E's a tidy little trooper—so 'e is!—an' ort to be, For they say 'e's like 'is father! 'oo's 'is father?

Carn't you SEE?

An' his mother? Sich a daisy! An' the kiddie? Lor' 'e's fine!

Straight, there ain't a boy in Lunnon but must knuckle down to mine—

Down to Billie, Brown-eyed Billie, Billie Boy.

O there ain't a joy in all the world Can touch a daddy's joy, As 'e 'olds aloft in gratitood 'Is fust bright, bouncin' boy; An' yer learnt me what it felt like— So yer did, my Billie Boy! 'E's that clever, It's amazin'! So it is!

'E's a handsome little beggar too, the wery print o' me,

Is my Billy, bouncing Billie, Billie Boy!

'Ow old is it? Is 'E, yer mean! Bare six weeks rear'd at most!

But—jes' talk o' breed and muscle! Now I ain't a chap to boast,

But 'e'd tackle 'alf a dozen brats, an' wipe the floor wiv three,

An' I larfs each time I sees 'im—'e's so wery much like me!

Ain't yer, Billie? What ho, Billie! Billie Boy!

'E's that artful, It's amazin'! So it is!

'E's a wonder, an' no error, jes' a copy of his dad, Larfin' Billie, chortlin' Billie, Billie Boy!

For we'd sorter separated, Liz an' me, afore 'e came,

Though she done 'er best to 'elp me (she were allus true and game !)

An' I took to drinkin' kindly—an' it kinder drove me mad.

I was jes' a bloomin' loafer. What? 'Oo 'auled me from the bad?

Why, my Bill, o' course, my Billie, Billie Boy!

O there ain't a joy in all the world Can touch a daddy's joy, As 'e sees 'is missus 'old aloft 'Is fust, bright, bouncin' boy; And yer linked our lives for ever— So yer did, my Billie Boy!

The Eternal Now

To dream of a gilded morrow shall we sleep through the golden day,

And steep for ever our senses in wishes and hopes and fears?

E'en as we long and repine the hour hath glided away, And added its wailing note to the dirge of the wasted years!

Sweet Jennie, with the Laughing Eyes

No treasured hope or fond ideal But comes as earnest of a real That lags behind. . . .

Alone in the steep, wild, waving grass,
By the four cross roads and the trysting stiles,
'Tis here I would dream of you—
When we were young, sweet Jennie, my lass,
And a world of sighs was a world of smiles,
And the old, old tale was new.
When all that was sweetest we labelled Truth,
And the faith of a child was ours:
Twin spirits of hope in a barque of youth,
Adrift on a sea of flowers.

Entranced by the freshness and fragrance around, The scent of the hawthorn, the dew on the ground, The blue of the sky and the lilt of the stream, I see you again in the heart of my dream: When hope was our rudder, and love was our star, And God was a Father who watched from afar.

Ah, Jennie mine own—with the dear trusting eyes, The faith of a child is the hope of the wise. The sweetest and fairest thy mind can conceive, That is Truth, saith my heart . . . Ah! . . . 'Twas sweet to believe.

Like Lingering Leaves

Like lingering leaves that—seeming—fear to fall,
Though seared and stricken by the Winter blast—
So hold we life most precious at the last,
Like lingering leaves.

Though death—we dare contend—is not the all, And naught that dies but blooms again serene, Fain would we linger o'er this closing scene.

And when, perforce, we answer to the call,
And younger players fill our vacant parts,
Fain would we live awhile—within your hearts,
Like lingering leaves.

Hereward's Appeal to his Mother after his Banishment from England*

NAY, good mother, stay! By Heaven I charge thee. In thy fair presence will I cast out pride, And kneel to thee with supplicating hand-To thee, and thee alone, good mother mine. Hence do I banish all ungentle thoughts, And plead to thee as son, thine own true son. Let mother nature be mine advocate: And if thy heart must needs condemn me still, Utter but one word of fair forgiveness, And frame those lips which I have lov'd so well To speak my name in tenderness and love. Then will I face the world with new-found heart, And banished hope, triumphant as of old, Forthwith will purge my soul of ev'ry hate And fast-set bitterness. O mother, speak, And bid those lips pronounce my name again! -But "Hereward," as they were wont to do, No more than "Hereward": 'tis all I need To stir to life a thousand memories Forever dead, an thou withhold'st thy love. I touch thy hand. But lift it once in blessing,

^{*} From "The Last of the English."

This fairest hand that first of all did bless me, And on the instant ev'ry curse decreed By King and Holy Church must needs turn traitor, And join with thee in common sacred cause. Yet spare me but a word, 'tis all I crave: O mother, mother, but one word!

Tosti's Vision *

Lord Hereward, but hear me:
These three St. Brice's eves have I beheld
By yonder fen an apparition rise
So like thee now, in ev'ry outward grace,
I well had been deceived—save closer range
Doth show thee older grown and sadder-eyed,
With something less of hope and more of care—
('Twould seem that fell extortioner, old Time,
Had wrested from thee more than was his due).
And thou art clad, as 'twere, in magic mail'
Divinely wrought, as by a sacred hand,
That renders thee invincible to all.

And thou dost stand as one invuln'rable!

And by thy side a woman kneels, who weeps,
And three times tenders thee a cross-crowned sword
Which thou dost wave from thee with sullen mien,
As moved thereby to anger. Then there comes,
As fitting with her action, lord, these words:
"England hath need of thee, Lord Hereward!
England hath need of thee. Let that suffice!
Thy sword, Lord Hereward! Thy country calls thee."
Then England's earth itself doth seem to groan
Beneath some new and alien tyranny,
And join the cry—"England hath need of thee,
Lord Hereward: England hath need of thee."...

^{*} From "The Last of the English."

And then, my lord, thy brow unclouded still, Harold, son of Wessex, kneels before thee, With bleeding, outstretch'd hands, and cypresscrown'd,

And cries to thee—" My brother Hereward,
O dear and banished lord, thy country calls thee!
With these white hands of death, I plead her cause.
By Senlac's blood I charge thee, Hereward!"
O then thy steeled heart shows like to break,
And tears of anguish fall a-down thy cheeks:
And thou dost lift thy sword and bow thy head,
And earth resoundeth still, and yet again:
"England hath need of thee, Lord Hereward:
Last of the English—Last of the English!"...

... Then doth the vision vanish, lord,
And thou art left to solitude awhile.
... Then, one by one, thy little chosen band,
And first among them those who close thee now,
Do kneel before thee, as e'en now they kneel
With swords uprais'd—and faerie vesper bells
Joy's tidings ring, "The Wake hath come again!"
Now once again that nigh-forgotten cheer—
"Ahoy, the Wake!" "Lord Hereward the Wake!"
And yoke-bow'd peasants straighten at the cry,
And, sobbing, kiss the ground about thy feet;
And louder still the news-proud vespers ring,
"The Wake is home again! The Wake!"

The Last of the English

At the Battle of Hastings

ETHELWYN: Hear, my lord, the noble Harold's charge.

. . . E'en as he knelt in that last hour of life, With hands uprais'd, as pleading England's cause, So may it be he kneels before thee now In unseen supplication yet again. An I could voice the glories of that hour, Or weave with magic words a deathless tale To animate an England yet to be, And stir her sons through centuries unfurl'd, Then but the name of Harold should suffice To call that spirit of resistance forth In peerless majesty, undimm'd by time. Then should the cry of "Senlac" steel men's hearts To battle fiercest in the blackest hour, To stand defiant 'gainst unnumber'd odds, And fight again as those brave Saxons fought, E'en to the last fierce rally of despair. My lord, as noble Harold charg'd thee then —The blinded, stricken Harold, dauntless still, Ne'er so undaunted as when England fell, True King of men, thrice royal in defeat, By nature crown'd and sceptr'd, England's lord-So do we charge thee now, in Harold's name,

To conjure forth that spirit yet again.

By Senlac's blood we charge thee, Hereward . . .

HEREWARD: "By Senlac's blood."

ETHELWYN: 'Tis Harold's word, my lord.

Amid his twenty thousand English slain,
In death's prophetic hour, he charg'd thee thus:

"O dear and banished lord, thy country calls thee: With these white hands of death I plead her cause.

By Senlac's blood I charge thee, Hereward!"

As then he knelt in agony of death,
So here perchance he kneels to thee again.

Thine answer, Hereward? What answer?

The Last Resistance of Hereward

TORFRIDA: ... Yet he yielded not ... still he scorn'd to yield! O great and fitting end! These last of all-These last proud, silent Englishmen-selfless, Grim, adamant, defiant, scornful still. "These proud, unconquerable Saxon fools." Well didst thou sound their praises, Taillebois, then ! But twelve surviv'd, yet did they scorn to yield. So will our children's children voice our tale, So will their children's children tell again How once a little band of Saxon men. A thousand strong in all, did hold at bay The flower of Norman chivalry.—Their sires, Rough men of their own blood, who fought and died To free them from oppression, and bequeath A priceless heritage that should endure. Then, when these French and English fight as one,

Will Normans joy to tell the tale anew:
How dearly, dearly did their fathers pay
For that ill-omen'd and untimely boast,
That England's heart was broken at a blow—
This English heart, indomitable still:
How that their iron King, this Conqueror,
Groaning in spirit for his Norman dead,
Turning his back on Ely, sick-at-heart,
Did pray men bring the Wake to him alive
That he might view a sterner than himself,
And court his fealty in terms of peace.
O nobly done! This last, the best of all:
But twelve surviv'd, yet did they scorn to yield!

Mukerji Lal

HAI, hai! Hullo there, Mukerji!
Hai, hai, Mukerji Lal!
My wholly delectable, highly respectable, encyclopedical Mukerji Lal.

He was a Bengali Babu
(Hai, Babu!)
Mukerji Lal was his name. (What a name!
It's a frankly impossible name.)
If you know Lord Macaulay's strong views on Bengalis,
My own are precisely the same,
Saccha hai!*
My views are precisely the same.
Your Bengali Babu is clever (too clever).
He's able, he's subtle, he's deep,
With the brain of a Leicestershire fox on the run,
And the heart of a Galloway sheep
(Are Bhai!)†
The heart of a Galloway sheep.

Mukerji Lal was my Babu. (Hai, Babu!)

^{*} That's the truth.

[†] Hullo, brother !

Thirty rupees was his pay—(monthly pay. It's absurdly inadequate pay)—
But Lal's education exceeded his station,
For Lal was a full-fledged B.A.
(Ho, ho!
A full-fledged Calcutta B.A.)
Yet Lal was excessively humble (too humble)
And always referred things to me,
Though I am a duffer who never could suffer
The thought of a beastly degree.
Bless you, no!
Away with your beastly degree!

Though I've long since forgotten
What little I knew,
And my Latin's so rotten
I couldn't construe
A passage from Cæsar for fifty rupees,
Trust Mukerji Lal, with consummatest ease,
To rattle him off—(Hai! Couldn't you, Mukerji?)
Gabble him off just as fast as you please.
Hai, hai! Mukerji Lal,
My encyclopedical Mukerji Lal,
My wholly delectable, hair-splitting, timorous, humble, grandiloquent Babu!

Of the awe I inspired in that Babu B.A. It were boastful to speak, though I'm tempted to say That I frequently wished my good mother could see The TREMENDOUS effect of my "Hai, Babuji!" (The unfailing effect of my "Hai, Babuji!")

How he sprang to his feet, how he rushed to obey My contrariest whim in the cheeriest way— Such a cheerful, bright, breezy, well-disciplined, affable, dutiful, beautiful Babu!

In my own sub-division of Chhothapegpore (I'm the deuce of a fellow in Chhothapegpore)
I'm the Barra Bahadur, the dominant race,
I'm the one out-and-out-and-out Sah'b in the place—
I'm the Sirkar, the Empire, the Lord knows what more,

And Mukerji Lal, as I've mentioned before, Was my highly reliable, wholly unmatchable, quite irreproachable Babu.

With his natty white socks and his natty white skirt,
With his goggles, umbrella, immaculate shirt,
From his shoes (patent shoes)
To his cap (smoking cap)
You never encountered the likes of the chap:
So diffident, erudite, smiling, alert,
A Crichton of Babus, I'm proud to assert,
And my personal, very own, only one, special one,
private, particular Babu.
(Quite indispensable Babu.)

But Mukerji Lal went to England
(Old England)
To read for the Bar his intent (rash intent.
I helped to support the intent).
Now no more "Babu, hai!" but "Old fellow, goodbye!"

I was sorry when Mukerji went—
So I was.
(I regretted the money I'd lent.)
And I gave him a chit * to my people. (Nice people, Respected at Clacton-on-Sea.)
And I asked them to take up the youth for my sake.
A word was sufficient from me.
(Bless their hearts!)
They were always devoted to me.

And Mukerji's luck was tremendous—
(Tre-mendous!)

Exceeding all rational bounds—normal bounds—
(Increasing by kangaroo bounds.)

His income from prizes of all sorts and sizes
Amounting to hundreds of pounds
(Think of that!)

To hundreds and hundreds of pounds.

For Mukerji went up to Oxford—(My Oxford—The Oxford that once sent me down).

I've his photograph here with a cock-a-hoop leer,
And a new academical gown
(Bless the boy!)

In his (Oxon. B.A.) hood and gown.

And his 'Varsity vogue was stupendous— Stu-pendous! And wisely Lal followed his star—(lucky star! I once pinned my faith in a star!) Now resolving to cram for the I.C. exam.,

^{*} A letter.

And most prudently shelving the Bar.

(Khabardar!*

It's a risky profession, the Bar.)

And he now and then journeyed to Clacton (First, Clacton !)

Where mother would press him to stay, And he really was kind to my people, I find, In a Barra Bahadur-like way (Hang his cheek!) In a cold, distant, dignified way.

I'm a very big pot, sir, in Chhothapegpore (I fancy I've touched on the matter before), But it mortifies me (With some cause, you'll agree) To be a mere cipher at Clacton-on-Sea. (I'm the veriest shrimp, sir, at Clacton-on-Sea!) Whilst Lal-(there's the rub)-might be Chief of Mysore,

Of Kashmir, Baroda, and Lord knows what more. He's the deuce of a dog. He's a Rajah incog.— Not the least like a Bengali Babu.

And ever Lal flourished in England (My England) And passed the I.C.S. exam. (All saláam! That's the Indian Civil exam.) I was not overjoyed (I was very annoyed) That's the kind of a fellow I am

^{*} Take care !

(Lal, Saldam!)
It's a dog-in-the-manger I am.
For mine is the Junior Service (slow service!),
The un-covenanted I.C.
And the letters C.S. always rouse, I confess,
The profoundest resentment in me—
(So they do)
Unquenchable envy in me.

And now he's my Barra Bahadur (Bahadur!)
Mr. M. Lal, C.S., District Judge. (Vide press: "Our eminent Indian Judge.")
And I'm here as before, back in Chhothapegpore, A hard-pressed old Government drudge (So I am),
I'm an over-worked, underpaid drudge.
But Lal is exceedingly gracious (too gracious),
With ever a kind word for me,
And who knows but one day Mr. Mukerji may
Be most useful at Clacton-on-Sea?
(That's my dream,
To be someone at Clacton-on-Sea!)

For my social ambition's enormous (E-normous!)
And when we retire 'twill be nice (rather nice—An English July can be nice)—
To have a "position"—(My dear wife's ambition)—A few chits from Lal will suffice (Bless you, yes!)
A word from old Lal will suffice.

And you'll see to it, Mukerji, won't yer? (Lal, won't yer?)

Though cunning and clever and deep, You've a heart after all, and I herewith recall My remark about Galloway sheep (So I do) Oh, they're devils, your Galloway sheep!

So it's Ho, Saláamut, Mukerji Lal, My eminent protégé, Mukerji Lal, My late unimpeachable, ex-irreproachable, still indispensable Babu.

" Fudge"

An Eerie Tale

The three mystic letters "S.P.R." stand for the Society for Psychical Research. Though the members of this Society have treated me a little unkindly in the present instance, I entertain the profoundest respect for them.

Shall we make a start?

PREAMBLE.

Mr. Justice Fudge

Is a very learned Judge

Of exceeding erudition, most profound in legal lore.

"Fudge on Contracts," be it noted,

Is a standard work and quoted

By the cream of learned Counsel twenty times a day and more;

Whilst of course his "Jurisprudence"

Is the text book for all students,

And his "Roman law" a classic, which they one and all adore.

Do you know it?

Bound in leather, red calf binding, six-and-eightpence? (I've a copy, slightly spotted, going cheap at three-and-four.)

*Would you know him, sir? Then read your " Fudge on Criminal Procedure." What a book, sir! Did you ever Meet with anything so clever? Would you shine as an Attorney? Would you steep yourself in crime, sir? Would you kill a weary Journey? Would you merely pass the time, sir? Would you pause in some endeavour To arrive at sound conclusions, With a brain befogg'd by wrangles, In a hundred legal tangles? Go to Fudge, sir! That your plan, sir! Fudge the Judge, sir! He's your man, sir! Fudge will dissipate confusions, Fudge will never fail you-NEVER! Follow Fudge, sir! (when you can, sir). Thomas Fudge, sir. Justice Fudge.

If—(with shocking inhumanity
To wound His lordship's vanity)—
Our artist WILL present him
In this manner indefensible:
A mass of gross rotundity,
And pudding-faced inanity—
Of course we can't prevent him, sir.
(Of course we can't prevent him.)
STILL—(ignoring such frivolities Entirely reprehensible)
Pray take a view more sensible,

^{*} Verses omitted in recitation.

SIR THOMAS FUDGE

And note his nobler qualities:
What wisdom! What profundity!
What depth! What breadth! What sanity!
What dignified jocundity!
What courtly, suave urbanity!*

PART I.

CHAPTER I.

Though pecking daws, With scratching claws, Would fain reveal his faults and flaws Behold unveil'd for your applause A pillar of society: Sir Thomas Fudge, The learned Judge, And acme of sobriety: Expounder of his country's laws, Chock full of maxims, moral saws, And what rude schoolboys term "pi-jaws" In infinite variety. Why care two straws for fool's guffaws? Alack, good sir, 'tis here we pause To contemplate the awful cause Of such excessive piety: His wife—Susannah, Lady Fudge! The partner of this worthy Judge, And prism of propriety.

* The very PICTURE over-awes!—
(Indeed, the way your artist draws
Her ladyship completely thaws
Our late displeasure),
We get the Cæsar eye and nose,
The Bismarck chin, the Cromwell pose,
The set expression—"Come to blows!"
In startling measure.*

CHAPTER II.

Alas, that Fudge (that gun of law)
Should prove himself a man of straw,
And hold in self-belittling awe
Another's daughter!
Yet underneath her ruling thumb
Sir Thomas Fudge would aye succumb
With acquiescence blind and dumb,
And weak as water.

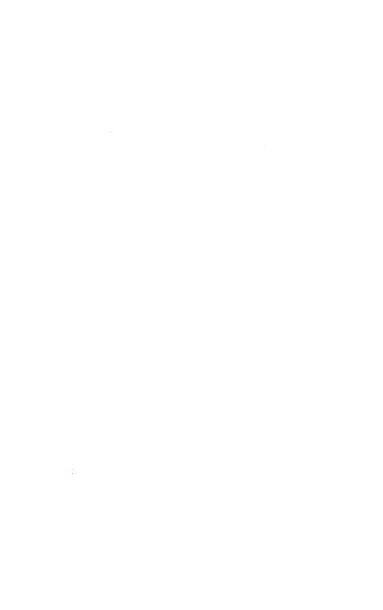

Her views were his, and his delight Seem'd ever to acclaim her right. Let her declare that black was white He'd not refute it. Or let her hold the moon was cheese, Or pigs could fly—such views as these Would but have won his "As you please! I'll not dispute it."

Her ev'ry hobby—(she'd a lot)— He would subscribe to on the spot: And, whether he approv'd or not, No man seemed firmer.

^{*} Verses omitted in recitation.

LADY FUDGE

"Ay, let her change them ev'ry day In her inconstant woman's way, He'd change his too," I've heard him say, "Without a murmur."

He never swore—though oft provok'd— He never laughed, he never joked, He never drank, he never smoked— (She was a tartar!) He never jibb'd—though tempted sore— But patiently his yokedom bore For twenty solid years or more, A silent martyr.

As president or shining light
Of causes she approv'd as right
You might have heard him any night
Her views expounding—
On women's wrongs or women's rights,
Theatre hats or chorus tights,
Or Tooting young men's social nights,
With skill astounding.

And if some wonder'd—(well they might!)
Why one so skill'd and erudite
Revers'd his judgments night by night,
His fame belying:
One glance at Lady Fudge reveal'd
A fact she never once conceal'd
—The wifely power her will could wield
'Twere vain defying.

Of all the fads she ever had, And she had many—(good and bad) Her latest is the only fad That nothing shatters.. Since occult lore of ev'ry kind First occupied the lady's mind No jot of pleasure can she find In mundane matters.

But shade and spook and eerie sprite (Who rap and tap, and read and write), Clairaudience and second-sight Completely rule her.
You know your Browning, so can judge When mediums allied to Sludge Are those most sought by Lady Fudge, They—mostly—fool her.

Her strangest whim would seem to be What psychic terminology
Dubs "Double Personality."
You know the theory?
How disembodied souls obtain
Possession of some mortal's brain,
And taste life's fickle joys again.
(It's awfu' eerie!)

Thus burglars, seized with sudden qualms, May spend their lives disbursing alms, Or singing penitential psalms—
(Most doleful singing).

Maintaining with no little pride But for that still small voice inside, Their "Dæmon" guide, they might ha' died, Inertly swinging.

So, too, the dearest, gentlest soul, Obedient to some sprite's control, May, willy-nilly, play the rôle Of dashing hero. Or palest curate, meek and shy, With kindest heart and mildest eye, May serve to harbour by-and-bye A fiddling Nero.

CHAPTER III.

Sir Thomas Fudge—(since time began There never was a wiser man)—
At last embark'd upon a plan
To burst the bubble.
For week on week he work'd it out,
And turn'd and twisted it about
'Till even he had little doubt
'Twould end the trouble.

Though pessimists are prone to say A Lord of time must needs obey Time's dreadful ordinance, decay, Quod omnes rexit.

Observe how in this shifting play The meanest dog may have his day, And wag his tail—(once, anyway)—Before his exit.

The sequence of my logic here, I entertain a passing fear, May not appear Unduly clear On close inspection. (Indeed, it just occurs to me 'Twixt premiss A and premiss B Your stern logician may not see The least connection.)

However, what I'm striving at, The point that I'm arriving at, And diligently driving at With no misgiving, Is, briefly this: though life be flat, Unprofitable and all that, How weary, stale our habitat, It's worth the living.

And there you are, sir! Q. E. D. If you agree, and I agree, Contradicente Nemine, What point in moralizing more? We've skirted round Some pleasant ground, And here we are again, you see, Precisely where we were before!

PART II.

CHAPTER I.

* An I could climb to heights sublime, And breathe Parnassian air, It were a crime with puny rhyme To taint a theme so rare— (That's trite and true, but rather too Suggestive of a pantomime). We'll start again:

'Twas in the prime of summer time—(No, no, that's Hood, so that won't do!)

'Twas in the Long Vacation time— (That's rather good, I think, don't you?) We'll let it go! Just once again: *

'Tis in the Long Vacation time,
And Lady Fudge—(howbeit Pm
Disposed to dub her crabb'd and sour,
And twenty summers past her prime)—
Is in the very pink and flower
Of pride and plenitude of power.
Arriving home, in Paquin frock
And Daimler car, at twelve o'clock,
Right pat with Big Ben's closing chime,
My lady—(Note the eerie hour)—
Gives one clear, loud, decisive knock:

^{*} Verses omitted in recitation.

Rat-tat-tat!
No more than that—
(That's one, not four)
Nor less
Nor more,
Just—one—loud—knock:

A sharp, emphatic, autocratic, fierce, mordacious, pervicacious, variegated, concentrated, complicated, cultivated, most expressive, aggressive, overbearing, self-reliant, dominating, aggravating, devil-daring, world-defiant, irritating, vicious, grating, cross, capricious, altercating, world-suspicious, world-dictating, calm, judicious, elevating, bold, ambitious, penetrating, cold, officious, calculating, nice, precise, discriminating, critical, pervestigating, sudden, swift, reverberating, "Only DARE to keep me waiting," "IN-STANTLY this door unlock!"-Subtle, sinister, satanic, trenchant, truculent, tyrannic, influential, consequential, Mede and Persian, harsh, Draconian, viraginian, Amazonian, grim, severe, loud, unethereal, prim, austere, proud, managerial, vain and mundane, most material, most unfurtive, most unmystic, self-assertive, egotistic, unmysterious, though abnormal; though informal, wholly serious; frigid, rigid, MOST imperious: "Open-Sesame -this-instant-or-I'll-show-yer!"-sort of knock.

Hold me redundant, sir, Superabundant, sir, Breaking all rational bounds of tautology: Not one word can I change, sir,
Re-call, re-arrange, sir,
Or syllable add in the way of apology—
So much is engrain'd, sir,
Explain'd and contain'd, sir,
Compress'd and convey'd in her Ladyship's knock.

CHAPTER II.

She pauses a spell.

She knocks once again:

Rat-tat-a-tat!—merely rat-tat-a-tat, sir.

Yet how can I tell,

How attempt to explain,

What words in the world can begin to express

All the wonderful things that she puts into that, sir?

The infinite subtlety, art and finesse!

The delicate shades and the exquisite hues,

The pregnant reflections, the personal views,

The—

Rat—tat—a—tat!

Now your honest virago: "I'll show 'em what's what!

"I'll read 'em a lesson. I'll serve it 'em hot!

" I'll fathom their game and improve on their plot!

"They'll pretty soon see if I'm mistress or not!

"To keep ME here knocking, and knocking, and knocking—

"It's shameful, disgraceful,

"It's scandalous, shocking!

"I don't care a jot what excuses they've got,

"Just as sure as I live I'll discharge the whole lot! "If I stood to be shot they should leave on the spot! "I never did-NEVER !_I_" RAT! TAT! TAT! TAT!

"That'll wake 'em all right! Now to let myself go! " Now to tell 'em some things that they're wanting to know!"

(It was always extremely distressing to me On the smallest untoward occasion to see How excessively vulgar my Lady could be.)-" I'll show that old Parker if two and two's four ! "I'll show James and Thomas the way to the door! "I've got just a few observations in store! "We'll see if they'll let this occur any more!" Rat-tat-tat-tat! Rat-tat-tat-tat! "I'll show 'em! I'll teach 'em! I'll— RAT-TAT-TAT-TAT!

Rat-a-tat! Rat-a-tat! From the roof to the ground Not a light in the house, not the ghost of a sound, Not the mew of a cat, not the bay of a hound, Not the stir of a mouse-Only silence —Horrible, mystical silence! Ominous, terrible, heart-chilling silence. Darkness unspeakable, darkness funereal-Darkness . . . and silence,

Darkness and silence.

Rat! Tat! Tat! Tat! (She's at it again!) Forte, crescendo, crescendo, fugato. Misterioso, piano, staccato.

Rat-tat-tat
The eternal refrain—
Patient, persistent, incessant, and rat-like,
Silky, smooth, stealthy, dispassionate, cat-like,
Honest, aggressive, ferocious and dog-like,
Jumpy and jerky and sudden and frog-like,
Coaxing, cajoling, insulting, offensive,
Fearless, defiant, alarm'd, apprehensive—
Ev'ry kind in the world, plus that PERSONAL touch,
The militant ego—(which meant very much!)

Another brief spell, sir,
Then at it again!
She tugs at the bell, sir.
(That's equally vain!)
She tugs and she hammers, she rings and she drums,
But nobody answers, and nobody comes.
For twenty good minutes (indeed, rather more)
She bullies and bangs that redoubtable door.

And the knocker—an imp with a horrible grin,
The very quintessence of metallised sin—
In a self-possess'd, vulgar, impertinent way
Just smiles all the while—a most maddening smile—
As much as to say—"Here's the devil to pay!
"Here's a sight worth a twenty mile walk any day!
"Keep at it, my Lady! Bray-vo! 'Ip-'urray!
"He, he, he, he! You're as good as a play!
"Strike me dumb if you ain't just as—"
Rat—tat—tat—tat

To a tremolo bar, on a lime-spotted stage, To rescue the dame from her pitiful plight, 'Twould be just about here that your "star" would appear

With a Perseus-like spring from the depths of the night. Observe, then, who comes, sir, and weep at the sight:

. . . A poor little page

Of the tenderest age

A weary wee wizened wan woe-begone wight, A scared little shivering shrimp of a mite,

(In his little py-"jams" and the deuce of a fright)

Rat-a-tat! Rat-a-tat! Clang! Rat-a-tat-tat!

With his heart in his mouth, down the long, winding flight,

Like a mouse in a cage
Just about to engage
In a Hobson's choice chat
With a conscienceless cat

He haltingly, fearfully, stealthily nears

That detestable door with its myriad fears—
Rat-a-tat! Rat-a-tat! Rat-a-tat!

Pulls the bolt, lifts the latch, turns the key, lights the light,

And tremblingly face Her ladyship's rage.

PART III.

CHAPTER I.

What my Lady had said to the poor little "Boots"
—(If the Fates had decreed, and my Lady had said it)—
Of course no one knows,
But it's fair to suppose

'Twould have shamed an Instructor of Cowboy Recruits,

And done the most season'd of Troopers much credit. But before the good lady can get in a word,
That absurd little page—(and he's quite too absurd)—
By the tale that he tells, the absurdest of tales,
In a tick takes the wind from her Ladyship's sails.

If you pick up the thread at the point where you read How discorporate sprites on occasion have led The most commonplace souls To assume divers rôles As remov'd from their natural bent as the Poles, I don't think you can fail To detect in the tale Which that poor little "Buttons" attempts to unfold—(Before the good lady can "start in" to scold)—An "S.P.R." case worth its burden in gold.

Though the tale lacks coherence and sequence and grammar,

Simplicity, elegance, eloquence, glamour,

Though he fumbles and splutters, and stumbles and stutters,

And the point is the last thing he thinks of arriving at, You will see in a trice what the wee mon is driving at.

" Are in hiding upstairs,

[&]quot;James and Thomas," he swears,

[&]quot;Barricading their bed-rooms with tables and chairs, ("And nothing will make 'em come out," he declares.)

"They was speechless with dread, as they'd both of 'em said,

"So someone must answer the door in their stead." Thence confusion had spread:

Little Jenkins has fled.

"Mr. Parker"—the butler—"is under his bed.

"Mrs. Joyce in 'isterics, an' light in 'er 'ead,

"The cook in a faint, the canary bird dead,

"Bruce, Emma and Mary is scared into fits,

"AND THE MASTER, SO 'ELP 'IM, IS OUT OF 'IS WITS!"

For hour after hour, with a quick, nervous tread, He had paced up and down
In his old dressing-gown—
(A dark woollen grey, with a border of red)—
And a tea-cosy perch'd on the top of his head
Which he wore
What was more

"Kind o' broadside afore

"Same as Hadmirals did when they wasn't ashore."

And the language he used at the top of his voice!

—He could only remember just two or three bits:

"Bassano, Marengo, Wagram, Austerlitz"— But he'd heard Mr. Parker inform Mrs. Joyce

"They was quite the most hawfullest swear-words in French

"As Sir Tummus 'ud never ha' used on the Bench."

Would my Lady go up? "She was dead sure to find 'im,

"With one 'and on 'is chest an' the other behind 'im,

"Still shoutin' them French words, an' scowlin' most 'orrid,

"And still up and down,

"Up and down,

"Up and down,

"With 'is good Templar sword 'anging under 'is gown,

"An' a new fancy curl 'anging plumb down 'is forehead.

"Whist!

"My lady could 'ear 'im!... 'Tout ça me rend fou!
"A bas les Anglais! Quatre Bras! Waterloo!'

"NOW she could see what 'e'd told 'er was true!"

CHAPTER II.

'Tis in the Long Vacation time, (Another month—the same old scene) And Lady Fudge, in Paquin frock (The very newest shade in green)-Arriving home at ten o'clock, Right pat again with Big Ben's chime, Gives one sweet, soft, persuasive knock-Rat-tat-tat-tat No more than that. Nor less, nor more, Just one soft knock— A sycophantic, sympathetic, lowly, meek, apologetic, Soothing, smoothing, sweet, poetic, Soft, sabbatical, ascetic, Simple, childlike, bland, ingenuous, Non-resisting, anti-strenuous, Acquiescent, over-pleasant, "Thank you, Parker, at your leisure!"

"Don't mind me. I'll wait with pleasure!"

"Only if you're passing, Thomas, turn the key please!" sort of knock.

CONCLUSION

What changed her?
Who changed her?
How came it about?
Though my theories you'd rout,
My hypotheses flout,
Though my facts you'd impugn and my evidence scout,
I submit there can be no scintilla of doubt
But that Nap—

Hullo! Steady!

I can't make it out.

There are one or two points . . . Let me see . . . Let me think . . .

Why the deuce does old Parker consistently wink,
And why does James smile in that singular way
When I go to enquire, as I do ev'ry day,
How my lord is progressing?—(He's daily progressing).
And Thomas, that pattern of servants and men,
With the face of a sphinx too—
I'm certain he winks too.
(I feel ture I've detected a wink now and then)

(I feel sure I've detected a wink now and then.)
And it's very distressing—extremely distressing,
Because I have studied the case through and through
From ev'ry conceivable sane point of view,
And I've sent a report to the "S.P.R." too—
(Just giving the facts, and suppressing the names,

Supported by Parker, Joyce, Thomas and James)—And I'm certain my thesis is out-and-out true.

The symptoms are these, Sir:—(I'll try to explain) One moment he's formal and normal and sane, As calm, as judicious, as deep and as clever, As cool, as collected, as charming as ever, But let him be vex'd or perplex'd, and the next You'd never believe 'twas the same fellow—Never! He will fume, he will rage, he will storm and rampage. He will growl like a bear, he will stamp and he'll swear (In extremely good French as my Lady is there). And the strange point is this—that if she isn't present, He is always extremely good-natured and pleasant.

But let her oppose him—one word from his wife, In the least degree spiteful or peevish or horrid, And before one says knife
Just as sure as your life
Plump goes that curl down the little man's forehead!
What is more, sir, before one more syllable's said
That cosy is perch'd on the top of his head!
So it seems to me clear, just as clear as can be,
That it's—Rat, tat, tat, tat!
Who the dickens is that?
. . . A telegraph boy with a message for me.

What the deuce do they mean by the single word, "Fudge"

From those "S.P.R." fellows, sir! Now we shall see!

When I purposely held back the name of the Judge? I wonder . . .

Joe Skinner, or The Man with the Sneer

"But, woe the while! our fathers' minds are dead, And we are govern'd with our mothers' spirits."

Julius Cæsar, Act I., Scene III.

PART THE FIRST

The girl with the squeaky soprano next door—
(With her trills and las
And do re mi fas),—
I was horribly tempted to smother,
And the brute with the flute—(who resides on my floor)

I'd have strangled with joy, with delirious joy, Though I knew him to be a most lovable boy, And exceedingly kind to his mother.

Comic song bawlers had passed by the score, Coster musicians, street organs galore, Till human endurance could bear it no more.

I had started to write—it was just after ten—At peace with the world, in my snug little den, With a beautiful thought at the tip of my pen. And now it was four—(My alarum said four)
And I hadn't begun,
Not one stroke had 1 done,
And my little alarum was pointing to four!

Then I started again! I had written one line (Which my landlady said was "uncommonly fine, "An' worth any two of the lodger's upstairs, "With all' is superior graces and airs") When—just as the clock was about to strike five, By all the untrumpeted martyrs alive If a STREET SINGING MENDICANT didn't arrive!

He was sturdy and strong,
Yet he hobbled along
At a tortoise-like pace,
(As though weary and worn)
With a sneer on his face
Which was quite out of place
In the case of a mendicant singer forlorn:
A combative sneer,
Saturnine and aggressive,
And wholly expressive
Of arrogant scorn,
Of taunting, inimical, insolent, impudent,
Militant, menacing, arrogant scorn.

With a leer
And a sneer,
Saturnine and aggressive,
Offensive, forbidding and proud,
In a voice penetrating
(And rasping and grating)
Untutored, discordant and loud,
He sang to the gibes and the sallies and jeers
Of your blatant Bank Holiday crowd—

Of your low-minded, frivolous, Gutter-born, gutter-bred, Blatant Bank Holiday crowd.

Then the girl with the squeaky soprano next door And the brute with the flute (who resides on my floor)

And the lodger upstairs (with the graces and airs),
And I fear me my kind little landlady too—
(It pains me extremely to mention her too!)
All joined in one loud, simultaneous—"Shoo!"
One highly indignant, entirely instinctive,
Ungentle, resentful, spontaneous—"Shoo!"
Yet !

(And here let it be noted how effectively I expend an entire line on a word of a single syllable to emphasize the supreme importance of the verses immediately following.)

Though the meanest gamin guy'd him—

(Mark this well, please !)

Though the meanest gamin guy'd him With boo-hoos of execration, And the noblest Duke decried him With a smothered imprecation, No obscurity shall hide him From MY meed of veneration In our artist's illustration, For your earnest contemplation, See the martyr'd saint enshrined!

Joe Skinner was a labourer, A strong and lusty labourer, A downright jovial, open-hearted, British working-man, (And I love your genial, open-hearted, British working-man!)

Therefore, think not I deride him,
When I say his face belied him,
For—let good or ill betide him!
It bespoke a gloomy mind,
A nasty, pessimistic, controversial turn of mind—
(And I loathe a pessimistic, controversial turn of mind!)

Still—although it marked dejection, Indicating introspection
Grimly chronic and emphatic,
I have frequently opined
(Like my publisher's rejection
Pessimistic, systematic,
Of the odes I deem'd ecstatic,)
Much he wished it to be kind.
Yes, this cannot be denied him,
Even though you can't abide him,
He'd as good a heart inside him
As you'd ever wish to find

When the working population Waxes fiercely democratic, And in every branch and section, Thanks to lack of trade protection, (Or to alien immigration) Funds are low and work erratic, At my earnest instigation Share my personal equation, And survey with delectation

Joseph Skinner in his attic,
In his lonely little attic,
Bed-and-sitting room combined—
Breakfast - dining - drawing - dressing - bed - and - sitting room combined.

Though ill-favouredly men eyed him Wheresoever they espied him, And the kindest vilified him With a malice wholly blind; Nothing troubled him or tried him, Gentlest thoughts preoccupied him, And I beg your predilection For a person so maligned.

Though I'm subject to correction, Let me note in this connection, That for every imperfection I have oftentimes divined Nature planned a compensation Best adapted to our station Or the humdrum occupation Which our destiny assigned.

With this passing observation,
And this somewhat trite reflection,
(You will pardon the digression?)
Let us take a peep behind
That unamiable expression
With which nature had supplied him
With a pre-determination
To be graciously inclined.

As the end and consummation
Of this wearisome laudation,
(This extravagant jobation, Complicated and entwined.)
Let me feel that I provide him
With your love and approbation!
Though the world at large may chide him,
For YOUR earnest contemplation
In our artist's illustration
See the martyr'd saint enshrined!

PART THE SECOND

With a sneer
And a leer,
Saturnine and aggressive,
And wholly expressive of scorn,
With the stars in the Heavens
At sixes and sevens,
Joe Skinner, our hero, was born!
And his infantine lip was derisively curled
As he gazed with delight on the things of this world.

As he languished and pined for his nurse's embrace, Or chortled and coo'd in his joy,
That worthy declared—to her lasting disgrace—
"She never 'ad seen such a 'orrid grimace,
"Such a double-dyed devil-may-care of a face"
(I give you my word that it wasn't the case)
"In a man—let alone of a boy!"

And though I maintain that the libel was base, Extremely offensive and quite out of place, The language his father thought fit to employ When first he encountered this sprig of his race, In a little white robe trimmed with valenciennes lace, Defies all description and limits of space.

But his mother—(Ah me! what a world is express'd In that fair name of mother!) all fondly caressed The little bald head cuddled close to her breast, And the little pink toes, And the small waxen nose, And the poor little lip that derisively curled, And called him the bonniest babe in the world!

Yet the neighbours would say—in their neighbourly way—

(In their glib, sotto voce, mock-lachrymose way)

" As 'ow the poor mite,

"They could weep at the sight,

"Growed more,

more and more

Like 'is mother each day:

"So fragile to look at, so puny in size,

"With the same little far-away look in 'is eyes,

"With the same timid spirit,

"The same wistful gaze,

"And the same little, dear little, meek little ways,

"And to mar all the lot-('twas exceedingly queer !)-

"The 'ole of 'is father summed up in a sneer."

But—(as Joe Skinner père was entirely aware)— From a fighting Joe Skinner 'twas wisdom to bear Any kind of a sneer with a diffident air:

"For wasn't 'e SKINNER THE SECOND—own son

- "To 'is father afore 'im the great SKINNER ONE,
- "The Battersea Basher" and "second to none-"
- " As 'ad fought 'is fust battle
- "Afore 'e could walk,
- "An' struck 'ome by instinct
- "Afore 'e could talk,
- "As 'ad whopped FIFTY 'eavyweight pugs in 'is time,"

And who even to-day (though some years past his prime)

Could tour with a circus,

Boomed, blazoned, and starred,

And offer, with swagger exceeding all bounds,

- "A cup as was valued at twenty-five pounds
- "To all as ud wenture—purfessionals barred—
- "To stand up agin 'im for three friendly rounds?"

But the way he said "friendly" was callous and hard, And the yokels would say,

As they limped from the fray

In a dazed, incoherent, aggrieved kind of way,

- "As to use sich a word was too bloomin' absurd
- "When they'd carry the marks to their last dyin' day!
- "'Twas a shame an' a scandal a-lurin' 'em there
- "On pertences like that, and a-callin' it fair,
- "When just ONE of Old Joe's famous knock-emdown blows
- "On the chin, or the jaw, or the belt, or the nose,
- "Was more than a hev'ryday mortal could bear.

"AN' 'IM STANDIN' GRINNIN' TOO!—quite at 'is ease,

"An' inwiteingly shoutin' -- 'Next gen'leman

please!'

"Why 'twas MURDER—no more and no less—so it were!"

Yet in Joe Skinner III. It was painful to see What a wisp of a fellow a Skinner could be, And it grieves me too add That the sight of the lad Would enrage his papa in the highest degree: "A durned little coward as dursn't reply "To the wags of the place "As made fun of 'is face, "But ud cling to 'is poor little mammie and cry, "Was"— he frequently said so-" A STANDIN' DISGRACE "As reflected on 'im an' the 'ole Skinner race." (And indeed it was true That the older he grew The more on the least provocation he flew To that good little woman for pity and care!) Then the small boys around Endless merriment found In a one-sided pastime they called "'are an' 'ound," But as poor little Skinner was always the hare "'Twas a game 'as 'e simply jes' couldn't a-bear!"

As Skinner père drew an extremely good screw He most wisely adopted the sensible view

Of putting aside all the cash he could spare

To bring out the best in his small son and heir:

- "Let the young un come 'ome once a week for a start,
- "But 'e'd put un to school where 'e'd 'ave to be smart,
- "And fight 'is own battles an' take 'is own part
- "With a pair o' tight fists and a stout British 'eart;
- "Not takin' things lyin',
- "But boldly replyin'
- "To insults and jeers"—(which he very well knew Every boy in the street with impunity threw At the poor little man)—"' cos 'is lip was askew."
- "Such insults defyin'
- "Instead of jes' flyin'
- "Like a whipped little cur to 'is mother an' cryin',
- "As a true-'earted Briton would scorn for to do!
- "Put him in his son's place, he'd show who was who,
- "'E'd soon put a stop to their booin' an' guyin'.
- "'E'd larn 'em a lesson! 'E'd knock out a few!
- "'' E'd stand no blamed nonsense! They'd soon tire of tryin'
- "To persecute 'im. 'Hit out quick and strike true!'
- "That was the course he was taught to pursue,
- "That was your only true wisdom worth buyin',
- "And that was the larnin' is boy should 'ave too!"

[&]quot;Let 'is missus protest,

[&]quot;Which 'e well knew she would,

[&]quot;But 'twas all for the best,

[&]quot;And was done for 'is good.

[&]quot;That-once and for all-must be quite understood!

[&]quot;He had made up his mind. 'E wasn't no fool,

- "So 'twas no use 'er sittin' there, sobbin' and sighin',
- "And a-wringin' 'er 'ands, and a-callin' 'im crool!
- "'Eaven 'elp the good woman, the boy wasn't dyin'-
- "'E was startin' in life at a quid-a-week school!"
- "At a quid-a-week school! Let'er ponder on that,
- "And for gentlemen's sons,' too!—the lucky young brat!
- "They'd pretty soon larn 'im to give tit for tat.
- "Why, they'd make such a change in the poor little worm
- "As she'd scarcely believe at the end o' the term.
- "'Twas no use 'er pleadin'
- "An' makin' a row,
- " As if 'er intercedin'
- "Could alter 'im now.
- "No, 'e'd made up 'is mind, an' e' meant to stand firm!"
- "Did 'e ever 'ave such a chance from 'is father?
- "Wouldn't 'e just ha' jumped at the thought of it?
- "RATHER!-
- "What did she think? Why, o' course 'e would!

 Jump at it?
- " JUMP at it!
- "'E'd ha' turned fifty somersaults! Bloomin' well FLOWN at it!
- "And 'ere was 'is missus a-gettin' the 'ump at it,
- "Thinkin' it proper to blubber and moan at it!
- "Throwin' cold water on such a fine plan, too!
- "Was EVER such 'eartless ingratitude seen ?
- "Fifty good thick'uns per annum it ran to,
- "An' 'er settin' there, an' a-callin' 'im mean!"

- "Not as 'e cared a 'ang if she thought fit to groan at it,
- "When HE made a start, 'e just carried things through.
- "If he wanted a thing—well, he just went 'right plump at it,'
- "That was 'is motter, AND a durned fine one too!
- "Just LOOK at the chap! Why, 'e 'adn't enough in 'im
- "To punish a fly as ud show any fight,
- "'Twas no good denyin' it-kiddin' an' bluffin' 'im;
- "'E knowed what 'e knowed, an' 'e knowed 'e was right!"
- "Make life a bit rough
- "For the durned little muff,
- "And 'e'd turn out as good as 'is father afore 'im,
- "AND a credit and pride to the mother as bore 'im.
- " A few kicks and knocks,
- "That ud knock out the muff in 'im!
- " A daily set-to,
- "That ud bring out the stuff in 'im.
- "Delicate, was 'e?
- "Well, school life would toughen 'im!"
- "Trust them sons o' the gentry! They'd soon larn 'im 'ow
- "To put up 'is dooks when it came to a row
- "With the mean little scum as made game of 'im now.
- "What HE wished to see was a Skinner the third,
- "With a stout Skinner 'eart in a stout Skinner frame,
- "As ud ADD to 'is father's an' grandfather's fame,

- "An' make every beggar turn tail when 'e came!
- "Not a cub as a cove need acknowledge with shame,
- "But a son as a SKINNER might even acclaim
- "As worthy alike of the breed and the name
- "(Could she wonder 'is fatherly feelin's was stirred
- "When 'e tenderly, lovingly thought o' the same?")"
- "Fifty thick'uns a year was a tidy big 'eap-
- "(There was some as might call it a trifle too steep)-
- "To pay for the little un's schoolin' an' keep,
- "But 'e'd looked more than once afore takin' the leap,
- "An' e'd pay FIFTY MORE, AND consider it cheap
- "If it learnt the young shaver to make a clean sweep
- "Of the gutter-bred crew as presumed to make fun
- "Of a boy as was everywhere known as the son
- "Of Joe Skinner the second, and second to none!
- "She might sit there till Doomsday, an' whimper an' weep,
- "But this whelp of a lion with the 'eart of a sheep
- "Was a blow to 'is pride as he felt very deep,
- "And a blow as 'e'd parry, whatever occurred!
- "A Skinner a skunk,
- "And a mean little funk!
- "'Twas agin all tradition, an' bloomin' absurd!"

Whist!

(Never so gently now!)

Soft!

Not a word!

Not a sound at your peril !—(we mustn't be heard.)

Let us fairily, warily, charily creep

Up the small attic flight, Second door to the right, To the wee fellow's bedside, and just steal a peep At the poor little man as he lies there asleep. What a theme for your cynic, my masters, is here! This meek little mite, So wan and so white. So tender, so slender, So puny and slight That an adamant heart might be touched at the sight, And that taunting, inimical, arrogant sneer! Was ever adjustment so grossly unfair? From the crown of his head to the tip of his nose, From his weak little chin to his ten little toes One eloquent plea for protection and care, And just that small lip with its meaningless leer Sufficient to damn him wherever he goes! What a theme for your cynic, my masters? Ah me! What a heartless old dramatist nature can be !

Though he wasn't to blame,
At school 'twas the same,
His chronic expression afforded rare game
To each tuppenny wit with a shaft to let fly
At the poor little beggar, too small to reply.
And by scholar and teacher alike—to their shame—
In a Spartan endeavour his spirit to tame,
He was cuffed and abused, bullied and bruised,
In short altogether outrageously used:
And if on occasion he sought to know why—
(With a sneer on his lip, and a tear in his eye)
They thuswise expounded their virtuous aim:

- "They were hard with a purpose, and harsh to be kind.
- "'Twas all for his good and extremely well meant,
- " And merely designed
- "With this object in mind:
- "To change his expression to one of content."

Under pressure of penalties, firm and severe, With this solace and cheer He contrived for a year By countless manœuvres to combat the sneer, But his friendliest smile fell unheeded and flat-Twas a menace at best—(and aggressive at that !) And his pleasantest word, howsoever sincere, That tyrannical lip would transform to a jeer 'Till sure he was fated By all to be hated, And bullied and beaten and badgered and baited, And feeling at best like a trapped little rat, Exposed to the view of each wayfaring cat, The gloom of despair seized the lone little brat. And I very much fear It may pain you to hear That contented no longer he tried to appear, Though he quite understood It was all for his good, (I hope I have made this sufficiently clear?) And devised to inure An ingenuus puer To smile at, and smile at, and calmly endure All the kicks and the knocks, And the sorrows and shocks Of a hand-to-mouth, happy-go-lucky career.

But if work days were sad for this slip of a lad, I feel certain 'twill make you exceedingly glad To know there was one day, And that day a Sunday, When things—on the whole—weren't so hopelessly bad. When, indeed, at odd moments he almost forgot His hard little, cramped little, sad little lot; When—(apart from the whacking received from his dad, Due to Skinner the elder's peculiar fad That all little boys, whether naughty or not, Should partake of a weekly corrective served hot)— Life, even for him, held one bright golden spot. One day in the seven when the knocks and the kicks And the sorrows and shocks of the other sad six All changed in a moment to laughter and joy, For mother, dear mother, was clasping her boy! Ay, hugging him tight in a loving embrace, And kissing his eager, upturned little face As though, spite the lip that derisively curled, 'Twere the sweetest and bonniest face in the world!

Ah, that wonderful day!

Could my weak words convey

Just a twentieth part of the joy in my heart

As I covertly watch the young beggar at play,

Or—(with big wonder eyes, open wide with delight)—

All contentedly perched on his fond mother's knee,

Then—though all else in this poem were trite—

Never so, never so, never so trite—

What a wonderful, wonderful, wonderful, wonderful,

WONDERFUL poem this poem would be!

But since my old quill has a wonderful way

Of declining to budge when I urge it to write All the wonderful things I am yearning to say, Will you please to imagine the wonderful sight, And, stealing one-twentieth part of my joy, Give a nod and a smile to the lone little boy?

Such a bright little fellow, I give you my word,
Such a light-hearted, gay little Skinner the third,
With his eyes all aglow, and his little lip curled,
Just the brightest and bonniest boy in the world!
Now playing at horses, so joyously playing,
And stamping and prancing and kicking and neighing,
With his proud little mother—betwixt you and me—
Enjoying the fun
Even more than her son,
And both just as happy, as happy, as happy,
As happy, as happy, as happy can be.
With her reins and her whip, and her "Woa, Neddy, woa!"

And her "Steady, my beauty!" and "Yoicks! Tally Ho!"

Ah, who could help loving and petting and spoiling, And tenderly guarding her wee little Joe, Her own little, frail little, dear little Joe?

But the saddest of all saddest days to recall
In the life of this sprig of humanity small
Is that day when he read
The scrawled message which said
That his dear little pal of a mother was dead.
(Alas, that this sorrow of sorrows should fall
On that meek unoffending, bowed-down little head!)

"Yet he wasn't to fret, or to mope, or to grieve,

"But accepting the blow as a true Skinner should

"-With a stiff upper lip-do his best to believe

"As 'twas somehow or other devised for his good.

"Which," as Joe père remarked, "was the best tone to take

"When a feller 'ad summat unpleasant to break

"To a kid like 'is Joe-(with a 'alf-quid or so

"Enclosed in a letter to soften the blow!")

Lone, motherless mite, with the sad wistful eyes,

Cold comfort to tell you that "God understands!"

Ah!... well may you gaze at the answerless skies,

Or bury that wee mocking face in your hands!

Gone!

Bolted!

Fled!

In the dawn, cold and grey, With a soft, nervous tread, At the first glimpse of day, From his hard little bed He had stolen away! Down the rickety stair, Whilst the other boys slept, He had stealthily carefully

cautiously

crept,

Then—out through the window,

The devil knew where!

Yet I happen to know— (Though they searched high and low With unwavering zeal for a twelvemonth or so,
With never a sign of poor runaway Joe)—
That that hapless young shaver, ill-used and ill-fed,
Was a-learnin' is Lunnon and begging his bread,
Picking up an odd penny wherever he could,
And trying to believe, as a true Skinner should,
"As 'twas all for the best an' devised for 'is good"—
With his bruised little back ever turned to the wall,
And that damnable sneer the one cause of it all.

As the boy, so the man, save as years crept along
He grew gay and light-hearted, and sturdy and strong,
Though unaltered his fate,
For I grieve to relate
That things, now as ever, went hopelessly wrong.
Though he worked—when he could— with unfailing good grace,

To apply for a job, with a sneer on his face,
And a look of disdain,
Made the kindest refrain
From giving the ill-fated beggar a place.
Then if to his comrades-in-sorrow he spoke,
Or ventured to crack an inspiriting joke,
They would all edge away
As much as to say,
"Well, ain't'e a nasty sarkestical bloke!"

Yet he'd made up his mind
Since he never could find
One solution of life which he quite understood,
Just to take this on trust—as the best of us must—
"That 'twas somehow or other devised for 'is good."

(Though in case this old saw Should unhappily draw From the learned and wise an impatient guffaw, Or a sceptical smile, let me hasten to add 'Twas the sole consolation the old fellow had.)

And so, step by step, this untrumpeted saint
Went steadily, steadily down to the end,
With never a sigh or a word of complaint,
With never a nod, or a smile, or a friend,
Till we meet him at last a street-singer forlorn,
With that look which he wore on the day he was

A leer
And a sneer,
Saturnine and aggressive,
And wholly expressive of arrogant scorn,
Of taunting, inimical, insolent, impudent,
Militant, menacing, arrogant scorn!

Still !

(And here once again let it be noted how effectively I expend an entire line on a word of a single syllable to emphasize the supreme importance of the verses immediately following.)

Though the meanest gamin guy'd him-

(Mark this well, please !)

Though the meanest gamin guy'd him With boo-hoos of execration, And the noblest Duke decried him With a smothered imprecation, No obscurity shall hide him

From MY meed of veneration. In our artist's illustration For your earnest contemplation See the martyred saint enshrined

Whist!
Never so gently now!
Soft!
Not a word!
Not a sound, my good masters!—(we mustn't be heard,)
Let us fairily, warily, charily creep
Up the small attic flight,
Through the door on your right,
To the old fellow's bedside, and just steal a peep
At the gentle old man as he lies there asleep:
So good and kind-hearted, so meek and so mild,
With the face of a satyr, the heart of a child.
What a heartless old dramatist nature can be!

THE END

POEMS IN DIVERS KEYS

AND

JOE SKINNER

OR, THE MAN WITH A SNEER

BY

ARTHUR SCOTT CRAVEN

SOME OPINIONS OF THE PRESS

- "Mr. Craven sings with equal ease in many tones—narrative, reflective, dialect, the light song, the serious monologue; the poet's interest always centering in human joys and sorrows, and his note clear, polished and musical."—The Times.
- "Delightfully told. Mr. Craven has airiness and pathos in his pen. He laughs and we laugh with him. He sorrows and we are sad."—The Daily Chronicle.
- "A poet of great charm and promise. . . . The true ring about it all . . . celebrated in lines of considerable force, humour and dexterity."—The Standard.
- "The facile and jocose spirit of the Rev. R. H. Barham. There is, however, a basis of genuine sentiment—even tragedy—for the poem."—The Observer.
- "There is a whole philosophy in the theme, and Mr. Craven has worked it out admirably. There is a fund of humour in his verse, and a fund of pathos, too—a pathos that insinuates itself with the naturalness of life, that is never blatant and out of place, and that never for a moment becomes sentimental. We must give praise to the extraordinary skill of the versification. There are but five rhymes used in several stanzas amounting to one hundred lines, yet the sense is never for a moment sacrificed, the rhythm never halts, and the whole has the quality of inevitableness."—The Literary World.

SOME OPINIONS OF THE PRESS

- "Mr. Craven writes with strength and sweetness and facility."—
 The Bookman.
- "In manner and measure it catches much of the headlong, rollicking lilt and gaiety of 'The Ingoldsby Legends,' but blends with it a tenderness and delicacy of fancy and sentiment that flower naturally from a sketch of the character. It is one of the most irresponsibly humorous, most quietly pathetic poems I have come across."—Martin Scribbler in The Reader.
- "Mr. Craven has a mastery of rhythm worthy of the writer of The Ingoldsby Legends."—Douglas Sladen in The Queen.
 - "No little reserve power."-Pall Mall Gazette.
 - "A very fine collection of poems." Outlook.
- "There is more than a touch of Tom Hood about Mr. Arthur Scott Craven: Hood's eye for valid poetry, Hood's amazing rhyme dexterity, Hood's gift for inducing pathos and humour to run in double harness. Out of 'a taunting, inimical, arrogant sneer' Mr. Craven conjures authentic tragedy."—Liverpool Courier.
- "Pathetic and beautiful in a very high degree."—Liverpool Post and Mercury.
- "A spring of clear, unforced utterance, a winning human note which sets all criticism aside and leaves the reader satisfied, not caring whether it could be better done, or done otherwise. 'Ave Maria' might be a companion poem to Hood's 'Bridge of Sighs.' The qualities present here mark the others, with in one a joy in nature and in another an exhilarating humour which bring an added charm."—Glasgow Herald.
- "One of the most distinguished among our younger poets, his poems reflect a mind of wonderful versatility."—South Wales Daily News.
 - 'The catching lilt of the 'Ingoldsby Legends.' "-The Scotsman.
- "Mr. Scott Craven at once steps into the very front rank of contemporary writers of poetry."—Western Morning News.
- "It is pathetic, cynical, optimistic, humorous and reflective; a certain wonderful courage, an indomitable determination to take the goddess of ill-fortune and smilingly and unostentatiously wring her neck, appears again and again. A writer of less distinction would have tarnished his pages with dross, but Mr. Craven cunningly finds nothing but ore."—Aberdeen Free Press.

SOME OPINIONS OF THE PRESS

- "A social study of rare power."-Bristol Mercury.
- "Mr. Craven, like Dean Swift, according to Stella, could write beautifully about a broom-stick. This singular poem is exquisite, delightful, a perfect gem of wit and pathos, of whimsical humour and of intense infectious feeling. Its strange, erratic rhyme, seems to flow fluently with such ease and swiftness that it carries the reader along resistlessly. The conceit of the boy whose one disadvantage in life was a sneer, furnishes Mr. Craven with his theme, and he traces its course from the cradle up with inimitable pleasantry."—Freeman's Journal.
- "The rich facility of 'The Ingoldsby Legends,"—Manchester Guardian.
- "The true poetic spirit, a wide command of language."—Morning Leader.
 - "Reads with a ring."-Nottingham Guardian.
 - "Wonderfully virile and amusing rhyme."-Lady.
 - "Finely conceived."-Sporting Times.
- "Their strength lies in their humour, pathos and tenderness, set off with exceptional skill in the poetic art."—Dundee Courier.
 - "Passages of great beauty."-Belfast News Letter.
 - "Extraordinary ingenuity of rhyme." Western Daily Press.

THE LAST OF THE ENGLISH

A PLAY IN FOUR ACTS

BY

ARTHUR SCOTT CRAVEN

2s. 6d. net

SOME OPINIONS OF THE PRESS

"Impregnated with Shakespearean design and tradition. Mr. Scott Craven has an extreme facility for verse. He knows his Shakespeare. He has a buoyant feeling for letters, and he has a splendid enthusiasm. It leads us to hope for a brilliant future. Aye, and to expect it, too."—The Daily Mail.

"Mr. Scott Craven has written a play which holds the attention, and, when the time for movement is reached, rises well on the wings of the opportunity. There are passages of genuine power and feeling. Here, for instance, is a fine speech of Hereward's:—

'Nay. Enough. Enough.

In light of better wisdom, dearly gain'd,
Let men hereafter smile at that we did,
Made bold by faith and hope of serving them,
I would believe that nations yet enwomb'd,
In mystic brotherhood conjoin'd to us,
Shall be the stronger for our sacrifice.
I would beget this larger faith in thee,
That nought we do or suffer is in vain,
An that uncertain light vouchsaf'd to us
Commend our enterprise: that nought of pith soe'er
Shall in the ultimate miscarry all,
That once held power to animate men's hearts,
And lift their souls to voluntary act,

SOME OPINIONS OF THE PRESS

How weary long the waiting. Needs must we esteem The genius of the age, set over us, The seer and oracle to be obey'd. Thus would I believe, and die in voicing it.'

- "Mr. Scott Craven gives frequent evidence of the same depth of feeling and artistic sincerity."—The Daily Telegraph.
 - "A stirring play."-The Athenaum.
- "Dramatic power and literary beauty. In a word, it is the work of an artist."—The Literary World.
- "The emasculation of modern English verse is undoubtedly due to the attitude of critic and public. The twenty-five years which have elapsed since the voices of our three Victorian giants grew feeble, have marked a change of attitude. The truth is that wecritics and public-have expressed a tendency to separate philosophy and poetry; the former is become the pièce de resistance at our literary feast, the latter a mere soufflé. Mr. Scott Craven has bravely ignored our change of canon. This is not to say that he has neglected regard for form, but that the thing which first compels our attention is his vigorous, sturdy philosophy. And it is a philosophy peculiarly apt to our present needs. We could, perhaps. pay the author no greater compliment than by applying his message to the general welfare of the English people. But he has written many passages of poetic beauty. He has, moreover, a gift of true humour and is not above a generous smile at his own philosophy, as in such a speech as the following, in the mouth of his most admirable fool Clover :-

'Our wills are leashed by circumstance, And fools would venture not could fools foresee. But shift responsibility to Heaven, And nought we will or do or dream's amiss. The which is soothing sophistry for fools, Or wisdom's last pronouncement.'

- "'The Last of the English' is cast in a strongly dramatic form, though doubtless a theatre audience would fail to grasp many of the subtleties of the philosophy that appeal to us in the study."—
 The Westminster Gazette.
- "Mr. Scott Craven writes a fluent, variable blank verse, and unfolds his story with an alert dramatic instinct. His characterisation is good, where occasion arises he gets fire and passion into his lines . . . a spirited and entirely interesting piece of work."—The Bookman.

SOME OPINIONS OF THE PRESS

"It is a fine reading play. In the smoothness and music of its lines it will probably remind the reader of the late Poet Laureate's work, 'Becket,' for example, while in the speeches after the Shake-spearean manner it will wholly give him pleasure. The play has a distinct individuality. Alas! that such plays in which the music, nobility and dignity of the English language are so well marked, should remain, for the most part, unmarked and often unappreciated, save by the few amongst the general public, the comparatively small number who properly value these additions to pure English literature. A careful perusal of the play will support a strong reason for the belief that Mr. Scott Craven's 'The Last of the English' is destined to take a prominent place among plays of historical and literary significance."—Western Daily Press.

"From a purely artistic point of view the merits of the work are great. These, however, considerable as they are, do not form the chief strength of the drama, which is to be sought rather in its enlightened patriotism and in its wholesome philosophy."—Aberdeen Free Press.

"Passages of exquisite beauty."-Freeman's Journal.

"His verse is eloquent. His conception of Hereward is individual and sustained, and the minor characters are real men and women."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"The dramatic situations are worked up with such consummate skill that the author has been enabled to dispense with much stuft which often only fogs. Indeed, Mr. Craven is an innovator in tragic language, for he rarely uses any but the simplest similes and metaphors, although some of his metrical experiments are as daring as the wording is plain. Readers who know the author's previous works will have expected his humour to find expression here. The scene between the fool and Torfrida is an exquisite piece of funning, alive with wit and courteous irony. Nowhere does Mr. Craven move with a firmer tread than in the exposition of this whimsical, melancholy and philosophic humour—it is his peculiar gift."—Oxford and Cambridge Review.

PR Craven 6005 Alarums and C855a excursions

uc southern regional library faculity

A 000 497 131 3

PR 6005 C855a

